IOC re-analysis programme

Beijing 2008

Initial re-analysis of the stored samples from Beijing 2008 was conducted in 2009, leading to five anti-doping rule violations (ADRVs).

Following an intelligence-gathering process that started in August 2015 – in consultation with the World Anti-Doping Agency (WADA) and International Federations (IFs) – additional analyses on samples collected during the Olympic Games Beijing 2008 were performed over the course of 2016.

Improved analytical methods were used to possibly detect prohibited substances that could not be identified by the analysis performed at the time of the Games.

The total number of samples selected for re-analysis was 1,053.

The programme for Beijing samples has concluded due to the statute of limitations.

Re-analysis programme

London 2012

Prior to the Olympic Games Rio 2016 and in the context of the investigations into the systematic manipulation of the anti-doping system in Russia, more than 500 re-analyses were conducted for London 2012, resulting in 48 Anti-Doping Rule Violations (ADRVs). These were mostly for anabolic steroids detected through the new “long-term metabolite (LTM) test”.

With the International Testing Agency (ITA) becoming operational in 2018, the IOC delegated the selection of further samples to be re-analysed and the results management to the agency, which would thus bring forward the cases and notify the athletes.

The re-analysis programme for the London Games uses the latest scientific analysis methods and aims to test samples for all the substances prohibited in 2012.

The total number of samples re-analysed is 2,148.
